The field of Applied Linguistics as a separate discipline was introduced in 1948 when first journal was named “Language Learning: A journal of Applied Linguistics” published in the university of Michigan. In 1950s, Applied Linguistics was meant to investigate Second Language Teaching (SLT), language skills and first language literacy issues. Later in 1960s, this was meant to be applied within language teaching domain, which had direct relation with the practical issues. In 1970s, this field emerged at a broader concept that focused not only on language-based issues of the real world but it also took insights from many other grown natural and social sciences sub-fields, like language policy planning and its implementation, the issue of bilingualism and multilingualism, Second Language Acquisition (SLA), language assessment, language minority rights to name the few with still many other practical disciplines. Applied linguistics mainly focuses on the research in learning, teaching and education that further reinforces the concepts of learning with proper attention, language awareness, and the ways of student-teacher interaction, the task-based teaching and action research that are carried by teacher as a the researcher. The focus has been shifted towards development of language of teacher as well. The teachers can engage themselves within the process of action research. Teaching and learning processes show effective progress in local classrooms because teachers are trained as reflective practitioners.
